A Daddy Wrote A Letter To His Daughter About Her Future Husband, But Every Woman Needs To Read It.

Dear Cutie Pie,

Recently, your mother and I were searching for an answer on Google. Halfway through entering "How to keep a man interested," Google auto-completed the search for us. Perched at the top of the list was "How to keep him interested."

It irritated me. I scanned several of the condescending articles about how to be sexy and sexual, when to brag him a home cooked meal, and the ways to make him feel smart and superior.

And I got angry.

Little One, it is not, has never been, and never will be your job to "keep him interested."

Little One, your only task is to know deeply in your soul — in that unshakeable place that isn't rattled by rejection and loss and ego — that you are worthy of love and belonging. And that, once that is worthy of interest also, the battle of your life will be mostly won. But that is a letter for another day.)

If you can trust your worth in this way, you will be attractive in the most important sense of the word: you will attract a boy who is both capable and worthy of your interest, and who will be investing all of his interest in you.

Little One, I want to tell you about the boy who doesn't need to be kept interested, because he knows you are interesting.

I don't care if he puts his elbows on the dinner table — as long as he puts his eyes on the way you glow when you smile. And then don't stop looking.

I don't care if he can't play a bit of golf with me, as long as he can play with the children you gift me with. Those silly, beautiful and frustrating ways they are just like you.

I don't care if he doesn't follow his wallet — as long as he follows his heart and it always leads him back to you.

I don't care if he is strong — as long as he gives you the space to exercise the strength that is in your heart.

I couldn't care less how he votes — as long as he values my every morning and daily checks you to see if you are safe in your home and a place of refreshment in his heart.

I don't care about the color of his skin — as long as he is willing to learn the rich, silly, and heartbreaking of patience, and sacrifice, and vulnerability, and tenderness.

I don't care if he was raised in this religion or that religion or no religion — as long as he was raised in the religion of humility, and the sacrament of life, and every moment of life with you, is deeply sacred.

In the end, Little One, if you stumble across a man like that and he and I have nothing else in common, we will have the most important thing in common.

You.

Because in the end, Little One, the only thing you should have to do is "keep him interested" — is to be you.

Your eternally interested guy,

Daddy
